Acknowledgments

This book was made possible through the contributions of knowledge I have gained from the hundreds of educators I have been fortunate enough to teach. Indeed, through their expertise, I have come to highly value the collaborative nature of online inquiry and learning. Every semester, I am honored to enter into a reciprocal learning adventure with the educators enrolled in my courses. Through our discussions, shared presentations, chats, and projects, I am continually introduced to new concepts, technology tools, and teaching methods. This is the true meaning of life-long learning as a community. As these educators and I have shared our learning with one another, I am now able to pass those understandings on to you.

I offer my deepest gratitude to Kristin Roth, development editor, at Idea Group Publishing for a level of support that empowered me to do my best work with the least stress possible—a true editor. Many additional words of thanks are also due to Melissa Slocum and Theresa Foster for their editorial assistance on the book.

Finally, I wish to thank my colleague, Dr. Carolyn Thorsen, for the opportunity to teach and refine my expertise in online teaching over the last four years. Her support encouraged me to push my own boundaries, to continue to explore and evolve as an online educator. Her professional approach to developing and modeling online education at the programmatic level has inspired my work and has helped me understand the limitless potential of distance learning. We are truly pioneers in a new form of learning that crosses boundaries of geography, race, class, and gender, and thus, we have become influential in creating a global society. And for that understanding, I offer my deepest gratitude.
