Acknowledgment

No book is possible without the assistance of other people. We would like to take this opportunity to thank the authors who contributed to this volume for their insights, experiences, and willingness to share their knowledge. We must also acknowledge the hundreds of providers, teachers, students, and administrators who have been brave enough and curious enough to embark on the journey of videoconferencing. They have been our muses and, as early adopters, have jumped into the world of videoconferencing and have kept us all grounded in the importance of the teaching and learning environment. They have reinforced for all involved that a good instructional environment happens because of caring and knowledge participants. Each success was a celebration, and each failure was treated as a noble failure from which we gained great insights and suggestions for new approaches. The teachers and their students are the true pioneers; we are only their biographers.

We would also like to thank Meg Stocking at IGI Global for her expertise in guiding us through this process and for her marvelous sense of humor and helpful attitude. A very special “thank you” goes to Kristina Osborne, our internal reader, secretary, and timekeeper; this process was made manageable by her hard work.

Finally, but not least, we would each like to thank our families, coworkers, and friends for their support, patience, and laughter during this process. As Emily Diekemper Hansen notes in her chapter, work should be fun, and you gave us the opportunity to make it so. A special “thank you” from Dianna Newman to Gary Clure for listening and supporting this effort, and to her children, she will go and get those birthday presents now. Additionally, Patricia Barbanell would like to thank Mark Edelstein, her husband, who remains, as always, one of the “Good Guys.”
