Acknowledgment

Writing a book is a complex and enduring journey in which the author discovers many fascinating things but at the same time feels frustrated, because there is no time (or space) to dig further into the other things that are revealed on the journey.

But the pleasure of this journey is that it involves enriching activities of discussion and exchange of ideas and experiences, and a whole mental and physical cycle of data and information processes (mining, collecting, processing, retrieving, storing, integrating, reusing, aggregating, and distributing), which are conducted with only one objective: to meet the public expectations.

These tasks could not be accomplished without the help and support of many. That is why I would like to explicitly acknowledge the help and support of some of the people (unfortunately, it is impossible to name all who directly or indirectly contributed to this end) who made it possible for me to complete this journey.

First, the publication of this book would not have been possible without the ongoing support of a diligent team of professionals at IGI Global, especially Alyssa Sweigart, Editorial Assistant, who formally invited me to write a book expanding a book chapter of mine published by this company in 2011. I am also grateful to Allyson Gard, Assistant Development Editor, Monica Speca, Editorial Assistant, Sara Neuman, Editorial Assistant, Ms. Jan Travers, Director of Intellectual Property and Contracts, and Allison McGinniss, Editorial Assistant, and to all the staff at IGI Global.

I am also indebted to all my students and colleagues on whom I, to some extent, tested the material of this book. I am also grateful for feedback from those individuals who attended my lectures and speeches at short courses, seminars, and congresses, as well as those members of enterprises and organizations who I could exchange experience while doing consultancy work.

Thanks!

José Carlos Cavalcanti
Federal University of Pernambuco, Brazil
April 2014