Acknowledgment

From the outside, editorial work seems easy and easeful, and I can attest that in general it is neither. However, if there is any such thing as a book that just sort of comes together without excessive strain, then this may well be it. Out of all the projects I’ve worked on, this one had the smoothest work process and surprisingly came in healthily under deadline. This is not to say that the work of research and writing was easy, and the double-blind peer critiques were likely fairly tough and grueling for some of the respective authors. The meld between academia and technology is not always smooth, and expectations of published works vary.

My deep gratitude goes to the authors who contributed to this text. Their hard work and generosity have made this text possible. The topics that obsess me and that fuel the work are almost always non-mainstream and “hard fun.” It’s pretty tough finding others who may have the same compulsions, and I am deeply grateful that there are others out there who share some of my same interests. In addition, virtually all the authors provided double-blind peer critique for several chapters each—for which I am grateful. This may seem like extraneous work, but it’s so critical to the ultimate quality of the text.

In the past several years, I’ve been taking graduate-level courses related to qualitative and mixed methods research, and I am grateful to my professors. The Editorial Advisory Board deserves special mention for their willingness to lend their names and hard work to this effort. In particular, prefatory comments were offered by William H. Hsu, Rob Gibson, and Nancy Hays. The three offered rich and original forewords. Even though all are busy professionals, Nancy, Rob, and Ya-Chun generously critiqued a number of draft chapters, which enhanced the respective works. Brent A. Anders generously spent time on a few draft chapter critiques.

In addition, I am grateful to Erin O’Dea and the many at IGI Global who invested much effort in this project. This manuscript was partially used to beta-test a book management tool at the publisher, and I am grateful to have been part of that effort. Thanks to Austin DeMarco for support in that effort. I am grateful for the supportiveness of the team that has made this book processing tool and their friendly outreach and support to the users. The marketing team at IGI-Global has always been highly supportive and professional. The typography and image layout were especially challenging in this text, and I am grateful to Kaitlyn Kulp and the others who brought together the book’s layout. A book is very much a collaborative endeavor that requires a wide skill set from people of good will.

Shalin Hai-Jew
Kansas State University, USA