Acknowledgment

Our parents, all of whom long ago joined the ancestors, must be credited with bringing us to where we stand today. They instilled in us a love of learning, and made us believe we were special in a world that would have us believe otherwise. We learned not to be limited by poverty or a world that is often filled with injustices, rather they taught us to take strength from the love of our Creator, our siblings, and ourselves. For that and so much more, we acknowledge our parents,--John and Agnes Jackson and Julius and Orema Ford. Also, we give special thanks to our many siblings and old friends for watching over us and giving us encouragement during difficult times.

To Blanche, thank you for prodding me into this project and being there to support me all the way. Without your keen research skills I would be severely limited. Your academic abilities are awesome, as is your dependability---I can always count on you to keep your word. Most of all you are a dear friend and, you make me laugh!

To Theron, thank you for many years of collaboration. You have helped me move from an idea to an actuality. Your ability to craft words into wonderful products is impressive and continues to amaze me. Your sense of conscience and integrity about issues related to diversity reteaches me to demand dignity and respect from all interactions.

Our sincere appreciation is given to the many authors and reviewers who helped and supported us in the development of this book. A very special thank you goes to the many students in our classrooms who have taught us so many professional and life lessons. Finally, we would like to thank Dr. Jeff Metcalf, President of Kentucky Christian University, who took time from his busy schedule to write the foreword for this book.
