Acknowledgment

For this book project to reach full implementation, several people contributed in various ways to the success of the book. We wish to thank the contributors of the chapters in this book for taking time out of their busy schedule to write academically engaging and provoking chapters on the state of media and politics in developing countries.

We also appreciate the invaluable support by the IGI Global team for providing useful information and guidance to the editors and contributors. Thank you for constantly being available to answer our numerous questions and coordinating the content to ensure that the book project was a success.

The editors also extend their profound gratitude to the manuscript reviewers for creating time from their busy schedules to review the chapters. By offering their critical reviews of the chapters, the quality of the book was guaranteed and their opinion on what should be in the book was immeasurable. Thank You. The editorial board also did a good job of drawing attention to issues that were of paramount importance in this book. Their various areas of expertise enriched the book and gave it an international flavor for global readership.

We cannot forget to thank the British Academy, the Westminster University and Moi University for sponsoring the Citizen Journalism conference in Nairobi in May, 2014. The Workshop was jointly organized by Winston Mano (University of Westminster) and Lynete Lusike Mukhongo (Moi University). It is during the discussions in the course of the workshop that the editors realized that there was need to have more research and dissemination of research findings and discussions on the political influence of the media in developing countries.

We therefore highly appreciate Dr. Winston Mano, the Principle Researcher for the UK-Africa Media Democracy Research Network for organizing the workshop in Nairobi, Kenya. We are also deeply grateful to Duncan Omanga offering to write a foreword for this volume.

Finally, we take this opportunity to thank Moi University staff for providing support secretariat services to us when we were working on the book. To all those who contributed directly or indirectly to the production of this book, we say Thank you.
