Acknowledgment

This text would not have been possible without a marvelous meeting of gifted minds. First and foremost, I want to gratefully acknowledge all of the creative and esteemed authors who shared their latest engrossing findings in the exciting and diverse areas of creativity. I look forward to our future correspondence and collaboration.

Secondly, I’d like to graciously thank the peer reviewers who meticulously evaluated the relevance of content, syntax and empirical rigor of each chapter. Thank you.

Marymount Manhattan College (MMC) students Michael Corning, Alicia Ferris, A. Kristina Keyser, Michael Rojas, Danielle Schlough and Carol Wagner graciously offered their assistance in the early stages of this project. It did not take long before they were inspired and enthused by the innovative research in this area. Marymount Manhattan College (MMC) is one of the most creative and refreshing institutions I have ever had the pleasure of being affiliated with and I thank the whole MMC Community for their constant support and encouragement.

Additionally, I am grateful to Allyson Gard, Janine Haughton, Caitlyn Martin, Jacqueline Sternberg, Jan Travers, Eleana Wehr, and Kayla Wolfe for their invaluable guidance during the editing process. They were always prompt, comprehensive, patient and gracious in their responses.

Moreover, I would like to thank my incredible husband, Dr. Ariel Brandwein and my charming and hilarious little men, Judah Lior, Jonah Gabriel, and Jacob Zeke Brandwein, for their good nature, humor, inspiration and patience throughout this endeavor. I want to acknowledge my father, Rabbi Paul Silton and my wonderful siblings, Elana, Michal, Akiva, Tamar, Aviva, and my twin sister Shira for their constant encouragement and support. Finally, I owe the largest debt of gratitude to a consummate renaissance woman and to one of my absolute greatest heroines, my mother, Faye Silton. Her brilliance, creativity, eloquence, wisdom, patience and love know no bounds. I will cherish this text all the more since her brilliant mind and loving hands painstakingly reviewed its contents.

I want to extend a final note of gratitude to all of the educators, academics, media, business, and arts professionals who continue to challenge traditional approaches in favor of innovation, divergent thinking and creative problem-solving.
