I have learned that success is to be measured not so much by the position that one has reached in life, as the obstacles which he has overcome while trying to succeed. – Booker T. Washington, in ‘Up from Slavery: An Autobiography’

This book would not have been realized without the help and encouragement of many people and organisations. We will only mention a few of them, not in any order of importance, as space is a major limiting factor. We note that all the contributions were significant and highly appreciated.

We gratefully acknowledge our authors for the time and effort they dedicated to this book and meeting deadlines that are inevitably imposed in such a project. We extend a special thanks to Eleana Wehr at IGI Global for her tireless effort and investment making this book project a reality, providing great flexibility, guidance and trust in the team. What a wonderful experience and privilege it has been working on this book with you in our corner.

Also critical to the publication process were those who worked behind the scenes proofreading the work, marketing the book and transforming it into hard copies, we are very grateful to them. We thank the reviewers who provided significant feedback and suggestions on the earlier drafts of the chapters. Without their advice and counsel, the quality of the chapters would have been compromised. The gatekeeping role played by the Advisory Editorial Board (AEB) cannot be overemphasized. AEB had to also adjudicate over controversial and difficult review cases. Thank you for making decisions that paid off in the end.

We are indebted to copyright holders who gave some of the authors the permission to use their work. Finally, we thank all our families and friends in the indigenous community for their support and believing in us.

We dedicate this book to Lawton Hikwa, cherished husband of Didekile Hikwa and distinguished scholar who passed away while it was in production. Those who had the great fortune of associating with him came to know his passion for indigenous ways of knowing.
