Acknowledgment

I would like to give a grateful note of thanks to every author who has contributed valuable research work, making the book that much more interesting and informative. State of the art research is always uncertain and risky. A research proposal, or a research plan, or even a commitment towards a research contribution, does not always result in one. One has to appreciate the work, and the commitment to work, of all the authors who have made contributions, often in a relatively short time. Each one was peer-reviewed. Some needed adjustments. In the end, all came out with flying colors.

At this time, I would also like to thank the reviewers, many of whom came from the list of authors. However, no reviewer had any idea of who the authors were. That is the honor code of reviewing, and the reviewers did a wonderful job, often returning the review in a very short time. I serve on the editorial boards of some journals and I really appreciate these fast reviews. I appreciate the time taken by the reviewers to do this.

One last comment refers to the global nature of the authors’ affiliations, reflecting the global nature of the interests and research works represented in this book. Globalization of operations is the nature of the world today, and is of importance to me in terms of research interests. Globalization is reflected most effectively in this book with contributions from many countries in several continents.

Barin Nag
Towson University, USA