Acknowledgment

I gratefully recognize all those at IGI Global who gave of their expertise and experience in developing, reviewing, and producing this book. I remain indebted to Julia Mosemann, Director of Book Publications, for her insights and advice throughout the creative process. The editorial production team at IGI Global also deserve my earnest thanks.

The Ontario Institute of Studies in Education of the University of Toronto (OISE/UT) has been a tremendous source of information and inspiration, as well as a vibrant and thriving space to write this book. In particular, there are several faculty members of the Adult Education and Community Development Program at OISE/UT to whom I owe a debt of gratitude. I thank Dr. Kiran Mirchandani for contributing a Foreword for this book. Kiran’s opening remarks succinctly and effectively capture and frame the arguments of this book with respect to workplace learning; technology; globalization; economic restructuring; and, the importance of the socio-cultural. I also acknowledge and express my appreciation to Dr. Daniel Schugurensky for his wisdom and teaching in the arenas of citizenship education and participatory democracy, and their significance for the digitized workplaces of the 21st century; Dr. Jack Quarter for his kind and patient guidance and counsel around cognitive psychology, constructivism, identity, and adult learning; as well as, Dr. Nancy Jackson for her theoretical and methodological orientation and advice regarding philosophies of science, and critical approaches to social science research in the workplace.

I convey my deep admiration to Catharine Allen. Catharine’s remarkable expertise in alternative dispute resolution and finding a commons in communicative spaces (both virtual and corporeal) enabled this book to authentically attend to socio-cultural sensitivity in the workplace. I also express my sincere gratitude to Nadim Kara. Nadim’s specialized expertise and experience in Human Resources, and the interrelationships between compensation, job design, and organizational training and development, informs this book around the complex technological and socio-cultural demands of the workplace. Finally, I must mention and gratefully thank my grandparents, the late Dr. Valimahomed Ahmed Lalani and Nabatkhanoo Lalani, for instilling in me a passion for social justice action; a desire for pursuing knowledge; and, their culmination in service to humanity.

Karim A. Remtulla
University of Toronto, Canada