Acknowledgment

Many people have contributed to this book’s completion and—we hope—its success. First, we thank Christine Bufton, the Editorial Communications Coordinator at IGI Global. She has been an advocate for us as we developed the collaborative processes used to produce this book. Because the methods we used to develop the book are highly unusual in the book publishing world, she deserves much credit for being forward thinking. She and other key IGI publishing staff have worked with us when we encountered challenges; we found solutions together, which has made collaborating with IGI Global pleasant and productive. From the Hewlett-Packard Company, we offer warm appreciation to Bobbi Gibson, who gave Charlotte the support and encouragement to pursue this project as a way to find and establish best practices for virtual collaborative writing.

We also thank our editorial review board members who read portions of the book-in-progress and provided us with thoughtful advice and encouraging words. We certainly appreciate their time and energies taking from their own busy work lives. Two text editors entered our collaborative process to help us to edit the disparate chapters into a cohesive, interrelated volume. We are eternally grateful to both Sandy MacLeod and Christina Lengyel for their sharp eyes and equally sharp wits in a harried editing period. We would be remiss not to thank Kent Taylor and Todd Ettelson. Kent provided us with unlimited use of the acrolinx® IQ to help us use terminology clearly across the book, while Todd taught us how to establish and manage a terminology base to standardize our use of terms.

Colleagues of chapter writers also have contributed their knowledge and experience to this book, both directly in reviewing draft chapters, and indirectly as practitioners whose collaborative work has made our chapters possible. We are grateful to them for their kindness in doing so, for they have made this a stronger book through their efforts.

Finally, we must acknowledge all of our writers in this book. They committed to us in an unusual book development process, stuck with us through glitches and successes, and they willingly gave over their chapter authorship in a collaborative process that enabled anyone involved in the book to read their work and suggest or make revisions. All of this work was accomplished through virtual technologies and collaborative processes. Their work enabled us to recognize inductively the six principles of collaboration that ground this book. The future of virtual collaborative writing in the workplace depends on writers like them. To our fellow collaborators: we admire your insights and thank you for generously sharing them with us and our readers.
