Acknowledgment

This book has been a project spanning more than two decades. Notwithstanding that, nobody writes and publishes a book by his or her own efforts alone. I am indebted to very many people and institutions that supported me during the research and writing of the book.

I am thankful to my family. Here, I wish to name Truphosa Gekonge, Dr. Eunice Omanga, and Dr. Bethsebah Gekonge for special mention. My family has always been a great source of inspiration, enthusiasm, and hope. They were particularly so during the research and writing of this book. I am extremely grateful for the support, fellowship, and prayers from Leverington Presbyterian Church in Roxborough, PA, USA. I am also very grateful to Mr. Yaron Bluevise for his generous financial support during the book development. I am grateful to Dr. Yeetey Enuameh. Dr. Enuameh did not only help me with gathering research data, but he also introduced me to Prof. Emmanuel Koku of Drexel University. Prof. Koku went through the first draft of the manuscript and made valuable comments that helped me set the tone of the book.

I am thankful to Dr. Martin Ogutu of the University of Nairobi in Kenya. Dr. Ogutu thoroughly went through the manuscript and made insightful and helpful changes. My gratitude goes to Prof. Arthur Frank of Drexel University. Prof. Frank gave the book the rigor it deserved. I am very thankful to Prof. Frank for writing a foreword for the book.

I am thankful to three knowledgeable and experienced African authors, who became my role models and guiding stars when researching and writing this book. These resourceful African talents are Prof. John Mbaku, Prof. Calestous Juma, and Dr. Dambisa Moyo. I have also been inspired by and benefited from—in my research and writing this book—the works of four great American authors, namely Mr. Thomas Friedman, Prof. Paul Krugman, Nicholas D. Kristof, and President Bill Clinton.
I am grateful for the insightful ideas I gained from the various people I worked with as a manager, consultant, and business counselor over the years. In this group, I wish to single out one person for special thanks: Mr. Julius Okara Barare. Mr. Barare was once my chief executive officer and mentor. He profoundly influenced my persistent character of pursuing an issue. He always had faith in me and expected the best out of me and often gave me the opportunity to prove it. He taught me that success was falling down and getting up one more time without end. I am eternally thankful to my editor, Austin DeMarco, and the two book reviewers he engaged for their thorough reviews and comments that helped to considerably improve the flow, cohesion, and readability of the book.

Lastly, but definitely not least, I am ever thankful to both Prof. Clint Tankersley and Prof. Peter Koveos, both of the Whitman School of Management, Syracuse University. They gave me unwavering support when I needed support most. Furthermore, they gave me an opportunity to teach a course on doing business on the global scene and enabled me to participate in the department’s outreach program to the Chamber of Commerce of Central New York. At this time, I met Prof. Pierre Yourougou, from Ivory Coast, and a Clinical Associate Professor of Finance, Syracuse University, who previously worked with the IMF. Prof. Yourougou and Prof. Peter Oslon, formerly a professor of management at Utica College, NY, critiqued various articles I wrote on management and “doing business in Africa.” These articles became the foundation of the various chapters of this book.

Finally, as an anonymous person once stated, “to err is human.” Any error of grammar, prose, fact, flow, and reference in this book is entirely mine alone and not of any of those persons, groups, and institutions that greatly helped me to research and successfully write this book.

Christopher O. Gekonge

Doing Business in Africa, Inc., USA