Acknowledgment

I would like to give the following acknowledgements for debts incurred during the composition of this work:

To the many librarians and library professionals I worked with at the Charleston County Public Library system. They reinforced my understanding that the library field is a noble cause and dedication. The challenges I had in handling their needs for information management directly inspired many of the technology solutions I developed and describe in this book.

I would like to give a nod to the inspiration from some of my past library colleagues who I worked with at Emory University’s Woodruff Library–alleviating some of the institutionalized silliness and inefficiencies we all had to deal with on a continuous basis were sources of general motivation for this book. First to Emory University itself, who taught me that the substance of an institution is usually established by the suborn virtues of its lower rank-and-file. I would like to thank the shelving minions and their big boss, Patrick Buckley, a real leader not by title but by deeds, whose intense dedication to professionalism and improved efficiency was superficially masked by his gothic demeanor and proud lack of social graces–a good man if I have ever met one. John Klinger, a brilliant artist trapped in a library professional’s body–never have I met a man so gifted in the art of the visual, a true diamond in the rough. Finally, to Lisa Block, a MLS (which we shall gracefully forgive her for). Though she and I could never get along as co-supervisors of our joint team–mostly my fault because I can be a real jerk sometimes–we developed a wonderful relationship otherwise. Lisa contributed a great deal of primary research to the foundation of this work, greatly improving its quality and content exponentially.
