Acknowledgment

First and foremost, thanks are due to the members of the Editorial Advisory Board, all colleagues who I know are extremely busy with their academic work and their own research, but who, nonetheless, took time out to give advice when needed and review many of the submitted chapters. Thanks too to the supplementary reviewers I had to call in when more chapters than expected came up for appraisal. Many of them definitely went the extra mile to ensure thoroughness in their appraisals. The Social Classroom owes a lot to their professionalism and scientific rectitude.

There can be no doubt that this book came about through the enthusiasm of the folks at IGI Global, who encouraged it from the moment I suggested it to them. I would sincerely like to thank Austin DeMarco, Editorial Assistant at IGI Global, for helping me throughout the development process of the manuscript. Austin was always extremely prompt to reply to my queries, helped guide my work within the parameters suggested by the publisher, but, most importantly of all, did so with an incredibly positive and pro-active attitude that helped boost waning spirits and made sure to encourage whenever it was needed.

Thanks to all the authors who enthusiastically submitted their proposals for this book, not least to the selected few who then went on to follow the directions of the reviewers and cooperate fully with editorial suggestions. These are the researchers and practitioners that in this book provide the content that will help colleagues understand better this very important area of research.

A final, but by no means less grateful, thank you goes to Marie Louise Kold, who not only read through most of the chapters with a keen eye for typos and expression difficulties but was also always there to help give an overworked editor a nudge in the right direction, helping keep the book on track and on time. It would not have been done without her.
