This book has been an interesting, emotional, and intellectual journey of self-discovery for me. It started with a several-hour long conversation with my co-editor, Dr. Kristina Setzekorn, at the GITM conference in Florida. This conversation made us both aware of the need for a “scientific” book on social networking and e-dating. This book is a tribute to Dr. Setzekorn’s enthusiasm and foresight. The book would not have been written if it were not for her.

Next, I would like to take this opportunity to thank IGI Global, the publisher of this book, and in particular, I would like to extend my sincere gratitude to Ms. Kristin Klinger, the acquisitions editor, Ms. Corrina Chandler, the business assistant, and Mr. Ross Miller, Ms. Deborah Yahnke, and Ms. Rebecca Beistline, the three editorial assistants at IGI Global who have supported us tirelessly throughout this book project.

The contributions of the team at IGI Global go above and beyond the technical assistance usually offered by a publisher to its authors. The team at IGI Global was actively involved in this book project from the very beginning. They offered many insights on how to convert our initial idea to write a special issue for a journal into a full fledged book proposal on social networking and e-dating. It was their insistence to include in the book both social networking and e-dating that resulted in a much wider and theoretically more significant scope for this book than we initially envisaged.

This book would not have been written if it were not for the pioneers of research on social networking and e-dating whose work has inspired us to initiate this project in the first place. The list of authors who made important contributions to the emerging body of research on social networking and e-dating is long. Many of them are quoted in the book and some of them were gracious enough to contribute chapters to our book.

There is, however, one author that I would like to single out, Dr. Andrea Baker, the author of the very first theoretically-based book on e-dating, Double Click: Romance and Commitment Among Online Couples (Hampton Press, 2005). Dr. Baker is also the author of the Foreword to our book. Dr. Baker’s book was preceded by at least a dozen books and many articles on social networking and e-dating. However, it was her book that was the very first to take a systematic, theory-based, approach to e-dating. As such, it was a very important inspiration to our project.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the members of my family, my husband, the Honorable Bill Callahan, and my children, David, Jonathan and Gail. It was their love and support, as well as their enthusiasm about social networking and e-dating that made this book project an enjoyable experience for me.
