Acknowledgment

The idea for this book and the need for a new model of why there are so few women in IT was mine, as was consuming and analysing the research and crafting the book, but there are three people without whom it would not have happened, plus three other acknowledgments I’d like to make.

I sincerely with all my heart and mind give my deepest thanks to Robin Craig, my life partner and editor. I thank you, thank you, thank you. In a way, this is our book, Robin: you were central to its completion. When I was having my “can’t do it, can’t fit it all in, I have other priorities” moments, and you wisely refocused me and got me back on track. When you so brilliantly decided your perfect role was my editor, because you know me so well and knew how to ensure my words were clear and purposeful. I thank you for being my sounding board, for flagging additional research areas, and for those early morning whiteboard sessions when you awoke and brought light and meaning to my previous hours of crafting and scribbling. For your brilliant scientific mind and helping construct the model that is so appropriate. For all the things you had to put up with and do without in your own life while this book consumed me. I thank you for knowing me. You are my Roark.

I am indebted to author Candice Lemon-Scott, who secured my publisher. When I had my “AH-HA!” moment in 2012, I was fortunate to be involved in a school community along with Candice. I approached her with my idea for a book and before I knew it she had sketched the outline, submitted it, and I had a publishing offer from IGI land in my email. Candice, I know you say you played a very small role, but without your interpretation of my “hey I have an idea for a book” and your knowledge of how and who to apply to, this would not have happened – thank you.

With a deep sense of gratitude, I thank Valerie O’Neill, who was roped into being my research assistant. After the excitement of receiving a publishing offer, I ran into time management issues and my energy was drawn into other areas. I even considered pulling out, until Valerie (a friend of Robin’s) came along and got me organized. Valerie set up my research directories and scanned the environment for appropriate research; she had the fun of ploughing through my many notes, emails, and items I had marked up and organising them as well as sourcing new material. Valerie, without your fabulous efforts, I would have cancelled the project, so thank you for the great work and especially for the reinvigoration.
To my Australian technology role models, Jenny Barbour, Karen Bard, Jenny Beresford, Madeleine Sanders, Barbara Tobin, and Ann Uldridge, we’ve had an interesting ride the past decades, and between us contributed a significant amount to the Australian technology landscape and learnt so, so much. I value you and your contributions to the industry, but mostly your friendship and how you have helped me grow.

To my double-blind peer reviewers: whoever you are, thank you, your comments helped apply focus and strengthen my message.

Finally, I must thank a piece of technology, my Nespresso™ coffee maker. Seriously – I wasn’t much of a coffee drinker before, but I needed additional hours in the day to be able to manage my company during a growth phase, my home life, and “the book.” I enjoyed being a science experiment and proving that coffee really does stimulate you ☺.

Thank you all.

Sonja Bernhardt, OAM
ThoughtWare, Australia