The production of a book is exciting, but complex. The editor would like to thank all the staff at Idea Group Inc., especially Mehdi Khosrow-Pour, Jan Travers, Amanda Kirlin, Andrew Bundy, Jennifer Neidig, and, particularly our development editor, Kristin Roth (who worked with me from beginning to end), for their constant assistance and expertise throughout the production process, from developing a book prospectus to completing the book editing procedure. I have thoroughly enjoyed working with such a reliable and high-energy publishing team.

The production of a book involves many individuals. Special thanks go to all involved the collation and review process of the book, without whose critical and valuable comments and suggestions book production could not have been satisfactorily completed. Special thanks also go to Ray Johnson at Fort Hays State University for his foreword to the book. Johnson has extensive experiences in diversity and technology in higher learning. He also provides workshops nationally on issues of diversity and development of strategic plans for educators, charitable organizations and business groups. I certainly value his voice when speaking of visions and challenges involving technology integration for diverse learners.

I would like to particularly express my appreciation to all of the chapter authors who wrote, revised, clarified and responded to my many inquiries during the editing process. Many contributors were also chapter reviewers. This publication and its value are truly built around such excellent contributors. Most contributors would not identify themselves as technologists; rather, they use technology to deliver or reinforce the content in which they are experts, focusing on learning engagement in diversity. Each author has shared practices, applications, discoveries and challenges encountered in improving the post-secondary teaching and learning process while making a positive difference through higher education.
In closing, I would like to thank my colleagues in the College of Professional Studies at the University of Guam, and Mary Spencer, dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Social Sciences, for their support and encouragement during the development of this manuscript. I would also like to express my thanks to all of the staff of the interlibrary loans department at the University of Guam for their constant assistance for getting references and materials. Finally, my special thanks go to Kazuko Onodera, my academic and lifelong mentor, who never lost faith in my scholarly endeavors and personal actualizations.
