About the Contributors

Margaret Pack is Associate Professor of Social Work and Deputy Head of School, Allied Health Australian Catholic University, Sydney, Australia. Her research interests include trauma and stress, theories of clinician self-care, and social workers’ theories for practice. She has worked in a national sexual abuse trauma centre with survivors of sexual abuse trauma as specialist case manager. Her career has included practice as a mental health social worker, where she has developed new services and managed staff as a team leader. Originally from New Zealand where she co-ordinated a national post graduate programme at Victoria University of Wellington, she has since led a team of social work academics at Charles Darwin University, Northern Territory, Australia.

Justin Cargill is a Subject Librarian in the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences at Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand. He has served as a reference librarian at Victoria University of Wellington since 1989 and in 2000 became the subject librarian for the University’s Graduate School of Nursing, Midwifery and Health. He works closely with staff and students providing teaching, learning, and research support. This includes research consultancy services and training in literature searching and research skills.

Carole Adamson is Senior Lecturer in Counselling, Human Services, and Social Work at the University of Auckland, where her research and teaching focuses on mental health, trauma, resilience, and stress. She is currently an executive member of the Council for Social Work Education Aotearoa New Zealand (CSWEANZ). She has research interests in developing resilient practitioners and in social work curriculum for disaster preparation and response. She has been a mental health social worker and also has experience in community development and residential social work. She became interested in critical incidents and the organisational responsibility for their management during her years in practice and further developed this through doctoral research. She sees a major focal point in her work as the articulation of theoretical perspectives and frameworks for social work practice that can integrate current, contextually-aware best practice and which can effectively be applied in practice settings.
About the Contributors

Ian Dore is a Senior Lecturer in Social Work at the University of Brighton, England, and qualified Practice Educator. Prior to entering into full-time higher education he was a senior social worker in a front-line child protection team. Since qualifying as a social worker his interests in evidence-based practice and ethics have continued, now incorporating knowing in practice. He also has an interest in practice education, particularly the role of emotion in learning.

Annette Flaherty is a Lecturer in Child Protection Studies at the Centre for Remote Health, Alice Springs, Australia, a joint centre of Flinders University and Charles Darwin University. She has worked in Central Australia since 1995, primarily with children and their families in the areas of child protection and maternal and child health. Her research interests include child protection practice, particularly in the area of child neglect and assessment of marginalised and disadvantaged populations.

Joseph Fleming works at the School of Health and Social Development, Deakin University. His interest in fathers and the topic of fatherhood began as a newly graduated social worker in the late 1990s while working as a child protection worker. In the period since he has been writing and researching the topic of fatherhood and child welfare and is particularly interested in developing effective practice models for fathers’s engagement with services.

Shiri Hergass is an art therapist and clinical social worker in Sydney, NSW, and a PhD candidate at Australian Catholic University, Sydney. Her experience has involved children and women in both the public and private sector, in work with Ethiopian mothers and children newly arrived in Israel, in reconciliation efforts between Bedouins, Arabs and Jews, and in other conflict-resolution groups. In New South Wales she ran a group for mothers and their children in Emu Plains Correctional Centre. She also developed groups for parents and children who have experienced trauma, called Free to Be Me. She has served as the country manager at Gunawirra, a not-for-profit organisation, working with 40 Aboriginal preschools throughout New South Wales, and she has a small private practice where she sees women and children from different cultures and supervises therapists and preschool directors.

Tara Hunt is a consultant and research assistant with Groupwork Solutions, New South Wales, Australia. She is Treasurer of the Lifeline South Coast (NSW) Board and a doctoral candidate at the University of Wollongong, exploring men’s health and suicide counselling.

Andrew King is a consultant trainer and programme developer in group work, working with men and strengths based practice at Groupwork Solutions, New South Wales, Australia. He has trained professionals throughout Australia and Canada in “working with men”. He is also an experienced practitioner having worked with teenagers who have drug and alcohol problems, young people with mental health issues, parenting education, and families who have children with special needs; he has coordinated a large fathers’ centre.
Fiona McDermott is an associate professor holding a joint appointment in the departments of social work at Monash University and Monash Health. Her teaching and research is in the areas of multiple and complex needs, health, mental health, and working with groups. She maintains a clinical practice in group work, co-facilitating two long term groups. She has a particular interest in the development, mentoring, and support of practitioner researchers, and in qualitative and action research approaches to research.

Mary Nash is an Associate Research Lecturer at Massey University, New Zealand, having recently retired from her position as senior lecturer in Social Work. She is a Life Member of the Aotearoa New Zealand Association of Social Workers. She has researched and published on spirituality and social work, as well as social work with refugees and migrants. She hopes to encourage increasing interest in both these areas of practice.

Kieran O’Donoghue is the Head of the School of Health and Social Services, Massey University, New Zealand. His research interests are social work supervision, social work theory and practice, and the social work profession.

Colin Pritchard is Research Professor in the School of Health and Social Care at Bournemouth University, a position he has held since 2003. Previously he was a lecturer in the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Leeds and held a Senior Lectureship at the University of Bath from 1976-80 before becoming Professor and Head of Department of Social Work at the University of Southampton from 1980-1987. He then continued in a research and teaching role, and from 1998-2003 he was Research Professor in Psychiatric Social Work in the Department of Psychiatry, School of Medicine, at the University of Southampton where he is now Emeritus and Visiting Professor. He has also been a Visiting Professor at the Universities of Curtin, Flinders, Monash, Queensland, and Sydney. He has served on the Prime Minister’s Strategy Group (Education) 2006 to 2008; he has been a member of the Post-Graduate Centre for Medical Education and Research from 2007 to the present; and he was appointed to the Royal College of Surgeons (England) Specialist Recertification Board in 2008. His research interests span neurosurgery, the child protection – psychiatric interface, cancer outcomes, morbidity and mortality and suicide studies.

Sebastian Rosenberg is Senior Lecturer in Mental Health Policy, Brain and Mind Research Institute, School of Medical Sciences, Sydney University. After a career as a public servant in both state and federal governments, he was Deputy CEO of the Mental Health Council of Australia from 2005-2009, assisting in the publication of the seminal Not for Service report (2005). In 2011 he worked as expert facilitator to the NSW Taskforce to Establish a Mental Health Commission and was convenor of the first joint meetings of Australian Mental Health Commissions. He was a member of the NHMRC’s Prevention and Community Health Committee from 2009-12 and a member of the Board of Social Firms Australia from 2012-2014. He is an Associate at the Menzies School of Health Policy and a member of the Clinical Senate of the ACT. He is a PhD candidate, focusing on mental health and accountability.
About the Contributors

Antoinette Umugwaneza is a Case Worker at New Zealand Refugee Services in Palmerston North, New Zealand and a tutor at Methodist Social Services. She was born in Rwanda and came to New Zealand as a refugee in 1996 after the Rwandan Genocide and mass killing which took place in 1994.

Bill Whyte is Professor of Social Work Studies in Criminal and Youth Justice at the University of Edinburgh. He was also Director of the Criminal Justice Social Work Development Centre for Scotland from 2001-2013. He teaches on youth and criminal justice social work, on practice policy and law, on desistence from crime, and effective intervention for undergraduate, postgraduate and post qualifying programmes. His recent research activities have involved research on routes out of prison, young people under 18 subject to Multi Agency Public Protection Arrangements (MAPPA), young people involved in sexually harmful behaviour, young people connected to organised crime, and restorative practice in serious crime.

Richard Williams is a Senior Lecturer in Social Work – Children and Families at Bournemouth University. He is also currently project managing a research project into child protection processes and procedures. His focus is on teaching, writing, and research on outcomes in general and the positive impact of social work in particular.