About the Contributors

Donald F. Norris is a professor and chair of the Department of Public Policy, and Director of the Maryland Institute for Policy Analysis and Research at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County. He is a specialist in public management, urban affairs, and the application, uses, and impacts of information technology in public organizations. He holds a BS in history from the University of Memphis and both an MA and a PhD in government from the University of Virginia.

* * *

Tony Carrizales is an assistant professor of public administration at Marist College, School of Management. Carrizales is an associate director for the E-Governance Institute at Rutgers University – Newark and managing editor for the Journal of Public Management and Social Policy. Carrizales received his master’s degree in public administration from the Cornell Institute of Public Affairs and his PhD in public administration from Rutgers University – Newark.
Yu-Che Chen is an assistant professor of e-government and public management at the Northern Illinois University, USA. Chen’s research interests include management of e-government projects and IT-enabled collaboration in management networks. He has published in Public Performance and Management Review, Social Science Computer Review, Government Information Quarterly, Public Administration Quarterly, and other journals. He also published IBM reports on IT outsourcing and the use of IT in combating global health-related crises. Chen teaches e-government and program evaluation courses. He serves on the IT committee of the National Association of Schools of Public Affairs and Administration and the editorial board for the International Journal of Electronic Government Research.

Daniela V. Dimitrova is an assistant professor in the Greenlee School of Journalism and Communication at Iowa State University. She received a PhD in mass communication from the University of Florida and an MA from the University of Oregon. Dimitrova teaches classes in multimedia production, international communications, and communication technology and social change. Her research interests focus on news framing of conflict events and international political communication. Dimitrova’s record includes research articles in the following journals: The Harvard International Journal of Press Politics, Gazette, Journalism Studies, Journal of Computer-Mediated Communication, Social Science Computer Review and Telecommunications Policy.

Marc Holzer is the dean and board of governors professor in the School of Public Affairs and Administration at Rutgers University – Newark. Dr. Holzer is the executive director of the National Center for Public Productivity and the E-Governance Institute. He is the founder and editor-in-chief of the Public Performance and Management Review. Dr. Holzer is a past president of the American Society for Public Administration and a fellow of the National Academy of Public Administration. Dr. Holzer holds a PhD in political science and master’s degree in public administration, both from the University of Michigan.

Chan-Gon Kim is the vice mayor of the Guro District in Seoul, South Korea. Kim has served as a career public official for 26 years, initiating and implementing a variety of programs. In particular, he is applying new information and communication technologies to provide public services to citizens in innovative ways. He previously served as an associate director of the E-Governance Institute at Rutgers University – Newark. Kim received his PhD in public administration from the School of Public Affairs and Administration at Rutgers University – Newark and a master’s in public administration from the University of Georgia.

Benjamin A. Lloyd holds a BA from Towson University and a Master of Public Policy from the University of Maryland, Baltimore County. From 2003 to 2005,
Ben was a research assistant at UMBC’s Maryland Institute for Policy Analysis and Research. He resides in Harford County, Maryland.

Jeremy Millard (senior consultant, Danish Technological Institute) has 30 years experience working with new technology, education, and training and in consultancy in the UK, Denmark, Europe, as well as globally. He has worked extensively with local and national governments and regional development agencies in all parts of the world. He is the coordinator of the European Best eEurope Practices Project, which presents and analyses the impact of good practice in e-government and other areas, and led a study for the European Commission on the reorganization of government back-offices for better electronic public services in 2004. He is currently working on user issues in e-government, and is surveying European e-government research and relating this to the major European economic and social policies.

Laurence Monnoyer-Smith, associate professor, is head of media studies at the University of Technology of Compiègne where she gives the introductory lecture on deliberative democracy and new technology. Her work is focused on the uses of ICT in politics in order to enhance political participation (electronic voting and deliberation plateforms). She has participated in several European/French contracts on e-voting and e-deliberation since 1999 and has published many articles on the subject.

Aroon Manoharan is currently pursuing his doctorate in public administration at the School of Public Affairs and Administration, Rutgers University – Newark. His research interests include public performance measurement and reporting, survey research, e-government, and public transit issues. He currently serves as the assistant editor of the Journal of Public Management and Social Policy. He received his Master of Public Administration from Kansas State University in 2005.

Mack C. Shelley, II (mshelley@iastate.edu) is university professor of statistics, educational leadership and policy studies, and political science, and director of the Research Institute for Studies in Education, Iowa State University. His research has addressed American government, public policy, and research methods and statistics.

Stuart W. Shulman (shulman@pitt.edu) is an assistant professor in the School of Information Sciences, with a joint appointment in the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs, and a senior research associate in the University Center for Social and Urban Research, at the University of Pittsburgh. His other research focuses on the impact of electronic rulemaking in citizen-government interaction.
Genie Stowers is professor of public administration at San Francisco State University. Her primary field of research is e-government and distance education. She teaches in the fields of public budgeting and finance, public policy and policy analysis, statistical applications, and information management.

Lisa Thrane (Lisa.Thrane@wichita.edu) is an assistant professor at Wichita State University. Her research interests include deviance, mental health, social inequality, digital citizenship, and research methods.

Ryad Titah is a PhD candidate at HEC Montréal. His research interests are in information technology adoption and impact in both public and private organizations. His doctoral dissertation focuses on conceptualizing and measuring the nonlinear relationships among individual and organizational factors explaining e-government capability development, adoption, and impact. He holds an MSc in information technology, a DESS in marketing, and a LSc in economics. His work has been published in journals such as Information Systems Research, Information Technology and People, International Journal of e-Government Research, and in academic conferences such as ACFAS and ICEG.