About the Editors

Kirk St. Amant is an Assistant Professor with the Department of English at Texas Tech University (USA), and he has a background in anthropology, international government, and technical communication. His research interests include intercultural communication with a focus on how online communication technologies affect cross-cultural interactions. He has taught online courses in intercultural communication for Mercer University and for James Madison University, and he has taught courses in e-commerce, distance education, and business communication in the Ukraine as a part of the USAID-sponsored Consortium for the Enhancement of Ukrainian Management Education (CEUME).

Pavel Zemliansky is an Assistant Professor of rhetoric and writing at James Madison University (USA) where he teaches courses in composition, computers and writing, and stylistics. Together with Wendy Bishop, he co-edited The Subject is Research: Processes and Practices, published by Boynton/Cook Heinemann in 2001. His collection, Research Writing Revisited: A Sourcebook for Teachers, also co-edited with Wendy Bishop, is forthcoming from Boynton/Cook Heinemann in the fall of 2004. He is the author of book chapters and articles on research writing pedagogy and computers and writing which have appeared in such journals as Composition Forum, Kairos, and Virginia English Bulletin.