Acknowledgment

I would like to thank IGI Global for affording me this opportunity to edit this book. It has reinforced my concerns for the intransigence of educational communities to change. Equally it has reassured me that change is possible, driven by the passion, enthusiasm and excitement of an increasing band of innovators. Forty seven of them present their findings here in twenty three chapters. I thank them all.

I also thank all the referees who provided constructive and comprehensive reviews of all the chapters. They work anonymously in the background, but their tireless effort is much appreciated.

Many thanks to the team at IGI Global, in particular Joel Gamon and Kristin Roth, who have answered my queries, provided advice, guidance and support and patiently tolerated my inability to always keep to the schedule.

Finally I must again thank all the authors for the excellent contributions. They have shared their work, failures and successes. Email is wonderful and this publication would not have been possible without it. The disadvantage of such a medium is that it does not provide me with the personal opportunity to thank you all for contributing to a book which will hopefully enlighten, support and encourage colleagues to venture into the technology supported learning and teaching arena.

John O'Donoghue
2009