

Acknowledgment

This book would not be complete without my acknowledgement of the extensive help and guidance provided by colleagues. First, I commend the editorial staff at IGI for providing a clear and complete plan for book development. While the production schedule was definitely not “relaxed,” it turned out to be realistic and attainable. Frequent communication and reminders from IGI and quick responses to my questions were a great help in staying on schedule.

The second group I must acknowledge are the authors who contributed to Patient-Centered E-Health. I had thought that a major obstacle to recruiting chapters might be my inability to “sell” the idea that such a book is actually needed. Instead, I found a cadre of contributors who not only recognize the need, but are passionate about this emerging field.

A third group I am deeply grateful to are the 55 reviewers who gave up a significant part of their summer break to evaluate and improve book chapters. This group includes many of the chapter authors, as well as numerous topic specialists who graciously volunteered their efforts.

Fourth, I wish to acknowledge my fellow faculty members in the Information Operations and Technology Management (IOTM) Department at the University of Toledo who were exceptionally understanding about the time I spent focusing on book editing and production in lieu of departmental business. I especially thank our IOTM secretary, Chris Humbert, for her assistance with mailing and logistics.

Finally, I thank Betty Wilson for conducting final checks of citations, references, indexing, and formatting for all the chapters. Betty is not only a skilled graphic designer and copy production specialist, but is also my wife, so I am especially pleased that we are still on good terms following book production.
