

Acknowledgments

The production of a book is exciting but complex. The editor would like to thank all the staff at Idea Group Inc., especially Mehdi Khosrow-Pour, Jan Travers, Amanda Kirlin, Andrew Bundy, Jennifer Neidig, Jamie Snavely, and particularly Kristin Roth (who worked with me from start to finish), for their constant assistance and expertise throughout the whole production process from developing a book prospectus to completing the book editing procedure. I have thoroughly enjoyed working with such a reliable and high-energy publishing team at Idea Group Inc.

The production of a book involves many individuals. Special thanks go to all involved in the review process of book chapters, without whose comprehensive, critical, and constructive comments and suggestions the book production could not have been satisfactorily completed. Special thanks also go to Mark Stansfield at the University of Paisley in Scotland for his Foreword to the book. He was also one of the chapter reviewers. Stansfield has extensive experiences in online education for lifelong learning and I certainly value his contribution.

I would like to express my sincere appreciation to all the chapter authors who wrote, revised, clarified, and responded to my many inquiries during the editing process particularly. Many of the chapter contributors were also the chapter reviewers. This publication and its value are truly built around such excellent contributors from all over the world. Most of the contributors would not identify themselves as technologists; rather, they are using information and communication technologies to deliver or to reinforce the content in which they are experts focusing on online lifelong learning. Chapter authors have shared their own practices, applications, observations, discoveries, and challenges encountered in improving teaching and learning, while making a positive difference through online education for lifelong learning.

In closing, I would like to thank my colleagues at the University of Guam for their encouragement and useful suggestions during the development of this publication. I would further like to express my thanks to all the staff of the Interlibrary Loans Department at the University of Guam for their assistance to get references and materials that I needed. Finally, my special thanks go to Kazuko Onodera, a retired educator and my academic and lifelong mentor, who never lost faith in my scholarly endeavors and personal actualizations.
